

FACEBOOK: THE CONTENT MODERATION HIDDEN BEHIND THE SCREEN

$200.97 Billion

Meta (formerly Facebook) reported a total of $200.97 billion in earnings for 2025. A record $59.89 billion of that was exclusively made in Q4 2025. Meta's family of apps was used by 3.58 billion people on average daily in December alone, bringing a 7% increase to the previous years.

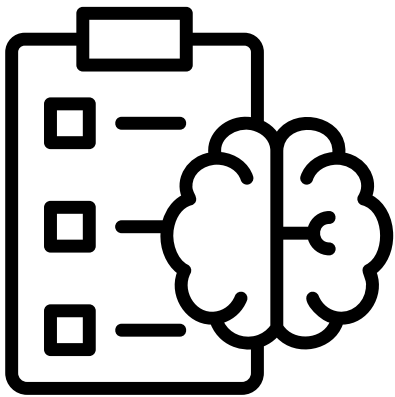

1

LOW WAGES

While Meta rakes in cash, their content moderators are struggling to make ends meet: Moderators in Phoenix will make just $28,800 per year – while the average Facebook employee has a total compensation of $240,000.

2

LACK OF MENTAL HEALTH RESOURCES

Facebook’s content moderators are required to watch countless hours of videos and photographs containing depictions of murder, sexual violence, and suicide. All the while, the company doesn’t provide any resources to properly manage the stress and

3

POOR ACCURACY

These content moderators are held to the target accuracy of 95 percent. This number is very unrealistic, forcing content moderators to ruin their health in order to attempt to keep their job.

4

SAFETY ISSUES

Content moderators often feel as though their work is being unfairly treated and will sometimes resort to solving the issue with violence. Some employees of Facebook mention wanting to carry a firearm in order to stay safe from their colleagues.

5

BONDS AMONG COLLEAGUES

Employees and content moderators often feel as though they can create quick friendships with their other colleagues. However, they claim that these are “trauma bonds” that are formed over poor working conditions. They often resort to “sex, drugs, and offensive jokes” in order to cope with this.
